2019's recovery offers a second chance

Executive summary

Low volatility strategies have become increasingly popular over the last 5-10 years as investors have looked for new ways to reduce risk.

Academic literature and our own research have shown that these strategies have offered significant downside protection during market downturns, with meaningful upside participation during bull markets, leading to equity-like returns (or better) over the long-term with fewer ups and downs along the way. Why is this valuable to investors?

One of the biggest mistakes that can be made following a market decline is selling at the bottom. Whether you are an investor resisting the behavioral temptation to become risk averse after a period of elevated volatility, or an investor with spending needs who may not want to raise cash immediately following a pullback, low volatility strategies can help investors stay invested by limiting the severity of portfolio swings.

The challenge is that many investors don't realize they need these strategies during a bull market, and by the time they want the downside protection, it's too late. The time to consider downside protection strategies is before a down market not during or after.

We were reminded of this lesson in the fourth quarter of 2018, when the Russell 1000® declined 13.8% in response to slowing economic growth, late cycle concerns, growing political risk including trade wars, concern over Fed policy, and a market hovering near all-time highs. During the fourth quarter drawdown, the BMO Disciplined U.S. Low Volatility Equity strategy only fell 7.1%,¹ providing almost 50% downside protection in just three months. And as expected, in the aftermath of this market decline, we've seen increased discussions with our clients about low volatility allocations.

The silver lining for most investors is that the sharp market recovery in 2019 is offering them a second chance. The market has regained its lost ground and remains near all-time highs, while many key risks driving markets lower during the fourth quarter remain valid (though less acute).

We urge investors to internalize lessons learned from the fourth quarter and revisit the role of low volatility strategies in their strategic allocations...before the next market downturn.

The silver lining for most investors is that the sharp market recovery in 2019 is offering them a second chance.
